Topic: Manual labour is more rewarding than White Collar

Name of my school: Velangaye Secondary School

Working long hours of strenuous duties with sweat rolling down their face is nothing than what manual labours earn monthly either than white collar labourers who earn less as much as they work effortlessly. I am a "Manual labourer" and my rewards are satisfying.

Manual labour is physical work done with hands, especially in an unskilled job such as fruit and vegetable picking, road building or any other field where the work may be considered physically arduous, which has a profitable objective usually the production of goods. Jobs that are based on personal know how are often the ones that can't be outsourced. Provides to be more challenging, more engaging and ultimately more rewarding.

Knowledge is something that can be stated from anywhere and put into a book and transmitted without loss, but this becomes a problem for those who are less fortunate, those who cannot read nor write. Resulting from them not being able to earn a living because of their background which is not fair. Whereas "know how" is always tied to the experience of an individual it gives a chance to less fortunate and non-educated people a chance to earn a living.

These are the kind of jobs that are based on personal know how are often the ones that can't be outsourced. This at the same time increases the economic growth while decreasing poverty on the other hand because no one runs out of work. The problem is that society developed a kind of educational monoculture where one has to go college and get on a certain career and end up doing something white collar what if i enjoy taking things apart and figuring out how they work, figuring out what fits in with what.

White collar jobs may sound great on paper or in the nations ear but the irony is that you make about twice the amount much working as an unlicensed electrician or a mechanic using your own judgements everyday where as when you're a knowledge worker you have to follow instructions and you could magically produce something without understanding, it doesn't need you to think logically. In other words you can call yourself a master of your own stuff.

Manual labour teaches you to be more dependant and stop expecting things coming from the government it gives you self reliance. There should be an honorable alternative for those who just feel completely against working in an office. The way to restore honor of the trades is to point out how intellectually demanding they can be. We should have a society that provides the opportunity to prosper for all of its citizens.

This world has became an unfair world it has adopted a bad habit, which judges by the facial appearance or by the blood that runs through our veins but money has became the most destructive element it turned the tables around: skilled workers are replaced with unskilled workers for lower pay, unqualified or qualified as long as your family or a friend your able to get the job that's the kind of dumping done by the white collar professionals.

Manual labour resists that system because you don't just follow a set of procedures it requires improvisation and adaptability and for that you take much pride for yourself again much dignity. Success is important but significance is even better. The most important elements of personal happiness is being passionate about your career and our jobs.

Some of these jobs may also not be the highest paying jobs in the world, but career passion is not about the money its about how the job makes you feel inside. If you take note you will notice that major or manual labour is the one that increases the countries economy it brings about an accelerating development within a country since they make and earn a lot of money.

The only disadvantage from being a manual labourer is that you don't have enough time to spend it with your family or friends because you work long hours but that can be resolved just by breaking down from work for a while and go on holiday to catch up and reconsult with them; or even ask your children to play a role by helping you like giving you tools if your a mechanic. A child also learns something from this; eg. ability to work as a team, how to fix something, you hit two birds with one stone.

You may come across problems at first but when you're passionate and dedicated everything is possible especially when you have hands to do and the brains to think the rest will follow and your obstacles have been removed. If god could situate me in a good financial environment I won't mind too much because he gave me more than what money can afford, which is my ability to do with my hand and think with my brains.

It is fair enough that the two parties earn to the value of the effort they put in their jobs so that is why I say: "my riches lies in my hands. Success is important but significance is even better."

White Collar Labour Is More Rewarding Than Manual Labour

White Collar Labour Is More Rewarding Than Manual Labour

Manual labour commonly known as physical work or hard labour can be a little rewarding, however it is not more rewarding than white collar labour referring to the professional work or indoor labour. White collar labour is more than rewarding, not even successful but it is seen as a medicine or cure to a better life for us all.

It is usually said that a person must stick to a career in his / her interests but manual labour is not so. Manual labourers just grab whatever is available for them for that particular moment so that they could just get something to eat and a roof over their heads. What is even worse is that manual labour is just temporary work which leaves you suffering and even battling to find another job. However, white collar labour is very much beneficial and people do it for enjoyment too, not just for the love of money. It doesn't even leave you suffering but leaves you rejoicing because you work under a contract of assured years and in which you can even get promoted from and earn a doubled salary.

Manual labour requires a lot of hardwork yet to find that they only earn a cent from it. "It is actually not different than voluntary work", once said Mr S. Giacinto, a gardener. Manual labourers wake up very early in the mornings to catch transport since they don't even own cars; they work for more than ten hours and not to mention working outdoors while they only earn R50 a day, not even 10% of white collar labourer's earnings. White collar labourers earn lumps sums of money while they sit in big offices and spinning chairs. They even order anything, anytime they feel like it and even have air-conditioners in their top offices.

The working conditions of manual labour is very disorganized and disappointing. The place is usually filthy and the labourers usually sort out the mess by themselves. Manual labourers get exposed to many contagious diseases. They get exposed to cold weather and catch flu very easily and even develop skin cancer due to the temperature extremes they come across from outdoors. People's health is supposed to be the number one priority in an organization but that doesn't apply to manual labour. Labourers cure diseases themselves in clinics since they don't even afford to pay doctors while they got infected in the workplace.

White collar labourer's rights are very much respected and taken into consideration, while manual labourer's rights don't even exist. White collar labourers have trade unions, they have a say on their salary's increase, they work in clean and healthy conditions, they have lunch and tea times, all their work is pleasant. Manual labourers just accept whatever is placed on the table since they are in need. They tend to forget their suppressed rights and even fail to speak for themselves.

White collar labourers usually own themselves and do as they wish in the workplace. If they have family problems, they can take days off work without getting fired. They have leaves and can even bribe doctors for unnecessary work sickness permit just to spend time with their beloved ones and spoil themselves. Manual labourers are no better than slaves. They work very hard but can get fired very easily, even for pregnancy and sometimes for trying to protect and fight for their rights.

Manual labour can help boost life a little but it makes it more challenging. That is why we shouldn't depend on it but depend on white collar labour as it is reliable, the best weapon to fight life with and certainly is more rewarding than anything you could ever think of.

Manual Labour is more rewarding than White collar labour

Less than 60 percent of student who enter a four-year college end up earning their degree from that institution within six years (of course, some of these students simply transfer and get their degree somewhere else, but you get the idea).

Why not make more effort in schools to find out what each student is most excited about and has an aptitude for, and help him or her develop in that direction. For some students, the chosen field might be Manual Labour or manship. And that should be manual acceptable. Manual labour, after all, is important and necessary work, recognizing an array of skills and abilities. Recognizing the value of that expertise by giving it a place in schools might be a first step to hard raising our estimation of it in Society as a whole.

In fact, however, it's not only not stupid - it may represent an incredibly savvy career choice these days. Unlike many traditional white-collar office jobs, these jobs are well positioned in today's economy, because they don't run the same risk of being outsourced - who's going to wait for someone to fly in from India to fix a toilet or repair a car?

Manual labour, in contrast to the white button-down shirts worn by men in professional occupations - these uniforms have become less prevalent with time, but it is possible to observe important differences between those occupational classifications. Blue-collar work can be unskilled, low skilled, or highly skilled ranging from relatively simple assembly-line manufacturing to the use of computerized equipment by automobile mechanics. Unskilled work does not require a great deal of training or human capital formation. Human capital is a workers productive capacity: his or her knowledge and skill in performing tasks. Common methods of acquiring human capital include formal schooling, apprenticeship programs, and on-the-job training. In addition, blue-collar jobs generally involve manual labour and physical tasks. Some of the occupations in this category are construction, maintenance, carpentry, assembly, plumbing and heating, typesetting, and truck driving.

Blue-collar workers often are paid an hourly rate and are eligible for overtime pay. Traditionally, many union jobs have been blue-collar, and union bargaining power has contributed to higher wages for those workers. Some aspects of blue-collar jobs are unpleasant, such as the risk associated with construction, fire fighting, and law enforcement. In general, blue-collar work is often standardized and less autonomous than other types of work. Particularly in manufacturing, workers have seen periods of low job security for many reasons, including the substitutability of physical capital, which is the machinery and equipment used in production.

Another important characteristic is that blue-collar work has been done mostly by men. For instance, in 1999, 38 percent of male workers were employed in blue-collar occupations, whereas only 11 percent of women were white-collar jobs. Generally, require a fair amount of formal schooling, including college degrees ranging from associate's degrees through professional degrees such as doctorates. Much of this white-collar work is performed sitting at a desk in an office environment, such as engineering, architecture, and bookkeeping. Many of these jobs are well paid, largely because of the amount of education and skill building required to enter these occupations.

Many White-collar jobs, particularly professional and technical jobs such as accountancy, law, and computer technology, are paid on a salaried basis. Hours worked per week tend to be very high in highly skilled white-collar jobs, with some people employees spending more than sixty or seventy hours per week working. Manual labour and little training, but nurses are highly skilled professionals. Many of these workers are paid an hourly wage, but few are unionized. Some jobs, such as chefs, require not only strong communication skills but also the ability to manage a large staff.

In the mid-1950s well over 30 percent of American jobs were in manufacturing, and in the next fifty years that declined to 11 percent of all jobs. In the late twentieth century American employment in agriculture and manufacturing declined substantially, whereas construction and transportation jobs became more prevalent.
